

SOME GERMAN SPIES ARE BRAVE,
SOME COWARDLY AT THEIR DEATHExecutions In Grim Tower of London Are Attended by Dramatic Circumstances; Some Spies Insist On Shaking Hands With the Firing Squad Before Being Shot Into Eternity.

Tower of London was the scene of the execution of the German spies. The execution of the German spies was a dramatic event. The spies were executed in the Tower of London. The execution was attended by a firing squad. The spies were executed in the Tower of London. The execution was attended by a firing squad.

The spy of fiction. Both were capable spies, whom their master thought likely to succeed in obtaining valuable information. The two men had been working in conjunction with each other and it was thought to be in keeping with the fitness of things that they should die in the same chair from the bullets of the same firing party, in the rifle range where their predecessor had died the last penalty.

"B" was one of the most valuable spies captured England made. A handsome looking man of about 30 years of age, six feet high, he remained absolutely cool from the time of his arrest until his career ended. Taken to Wandsworth prison to await trial, he caused the authorities much perturbation for his attempts at suicide. On one occasion he nearly succeeded in bleeding himself to death by forcing his arms through the window of his cell.

An El Paso Boy Who Shot At Submarines

WESLEY J. COLEMAN, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Coleman, of 2305 San Jose street. Young Coleman, who is 12 years old, was born and reared in El Paso. He has been in the service of the United States navy for the past year. He has had some very thrilling experiences, having been aboard the battleship Vermont, when it sank a submarine in English waters. He is now at Yorktown, Va. Prior to entering the service he was connected with the firm of H. Welch and company.

The eyes of the condemned man were tightly bandaged, his chest bared to the cold morning air. The order to fire rang out, and with the burst of flame from eight rifles one of Germany's most trusted spies had terminated his earthly career.

Both are aristocrats. "B" and "C" were both aristocrats, well educated men able to speak many languages, and of a type to pass muster in any society. Both were thoroughly well known in the fashionable east end of London and their capture put an end to what might have been extremely dangerous operations. "C" in particular was a particularly grave menace to the cause of the allies; he had mixed with many

With naval documents, and like a wise man, made no fuss. He knew he was doomed from the outset, and took everything connected with his trial and subsequent condemnation as a matter of course. While in Wandsworth prison he earned the authorities no trouble, and on being taken to the Tower of London on the day before his execution, merely exhibited mild curiosity as to where he was going. "You will see soon enough," the A. P. M. in charge of the prisoner grimly told him, and he said no more.

Wipe Glasses Before Death. Take all the other spies executed at the Tower, "C" spent his last night within his time-served and forbidding precincts. Led forth in the dim grey of a September morning, he listened unmoved to the reading of his sentence. He wore his glasses right up to the time his eyes were bandaged. When the sergeant major in charge told him to remove them, he carefully took them off, mechanically started to dust them with his handkerchief, then, smiling sadly, put the handkerchief back in his pocket, banded them over, and went to his death with the utmost composure.

Of all spies caught here during the war the most dapper was a little Peruvian whom I must call "A." A tiny little fellow, only 5 feet 4 inches in height, he came to England, ostensibly as a commercial agent, at the instigation of one of the German ministers in South America. When arrested he had on him a most elaborate set of false papers. Smartly dressed, he was a credit to his country. He nevertheless proved useless to Germany because none of his information got out of the country. He was incarcerated in Wandsworth prison, and was taken to the Tower to be shot on September 11, 1915, the day after crossing "C" met his death.

For reasons connected with certain of his accomplices about whom the intelligence officers hoped to get him to talk, the sentence was not carried out for another week. But at daybreak on September 17, "A" paid the supreme penalty. The military range again being the scene of execution. The little Peruvian went to his death with a fair show of indifference.

"X" was the assumed name of an extremely dangerous character, well known in the West Side of London, where he was arrested in a famous restaurant in company with a female accomplice. He was a great dandy and affected the most expensive and haughty of a smart man about town.

Friends Unaware of His Death. The acquaintances, of whom he had many, are still unaware of his fate, and questions as to his whereabouts are heard still on many fair lips. His specialty was the acquisition of naval information, and for this purpose he was employed, women whom he was to try to turn naval officers. It was one of these women with whom he was dining when justice swooped down on him and landed the pair in Pentonville prison.

Young, well dressed, with a distinguished air, "X" accomplished more than most German agents and

Corp. John L. Barker, Estancia, N. M. Private.Called down circles upon his Maker. While on his way from the condemned cell to the rifle range, either the man went mad with terror, or he hoped that he could convince the inexorable instruments of justice of his British nationality and so escape at the last moment, for, to the horror of his executioners, he made a feeble effort to sing "Dixie."
Forcibly placed in the death chair, he struggled violently and succeeded in tearing the bandage from his eyes, all the time shouting and screaming that God had deserted him, that his wife should be brought to him and that he was not a German. The bullets of the firing party put an end to his miserable life while he yells—(Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
